One of the most obtuse of these short works, "Bartleby, the Scrivener," subtitled "A Story of Wall-Street," was published for $85 in Putnam's magazine in November and December 1853; its focus is on the dehumanization of a copyist, the nineteenth-century equivalent of a photocopy machine.

About Bartleby, the Scrivener"" - CliffsNotes

From its very first sentence, Melville signals to the reader that Bartleby, the Scrivener is a story in which language isn't always meant to be taken at face value. The Lawyer, who narrates the entire story, describes himself in the first line as "a rather elderly man." Presumably, The Lawyer knows his own age, but instead of passing that information along to the reader he chooses to describe himself as elderly—but he doesn't just...
