Most choroidal fissure cysts (CFC) are believed to be benign and asymptomatic and are usually an incidental MRI finding, when the latter is performed to exclude other diagnostic hypotheses. At MRI, CFC usually appear as focal CSF-intensity lesions which dilate the choroidal fissure of the temporal lobe. Therefore, MRI findings of the CSF-like cysts are important to recognize, so that they are not confused with other, more serious entities, such as

Hi. The cyst that was visualized in the temporal lobe on MRI may possibly be an arachnoid cyst. This is a sac filled with cerebrospinal fluid and is located between the brain and the arachnoid membrane, which is one of the three membranes that cover the brain. Symptoms associated with arachnoid cysts, when they do become symptomatic, include headache, nausea, vomiting, seizures, hearing and visual disturbances, vertigo, and difficulties with balance and walking.
