Three Squares is a really interesting book that charts the evolution of the American meal, from the concept of snacking to how courses evolved and the way cultural norms dictated how Americans ate. However what is strange is how the book completely omits the influence of immigrant communities on the American meal, or any mentions of foods eaten by African-Americans.

I've just finished reading Three Squares: The Invention of the American Meal by Abigail Carroll and found it to be a fantastic text filled with historic food facts! Three Squares treats us to a food timeline in US history. Carroll begins with what mealtime likely usually looked like for settlers in the 17th century (when European colonists began planting roots and observing the foods Native Americans consumed)...
